“Live with no excuses, Travel with no regrets”

In today’s hustle-bustle and chaos filled world, travelling takes a back seat for people who are often chained to their careers. Most often we come across people who tend to have a mindset and falsely believe that people who travel have money and consider it a privilege. Discussions with people for whom travel is a passion, a Hobby or as a part of their profession, reveals that they are the happiest bunch of people. Backpackers are often known to unravel the mysteries of life. The perks of travelling often grows to be a long chain.

Travelling is an evidence of a person’s intellect. People who travel frequently, are known to be the most intellectual ones. Travelling has helped them expand their knowledge horizon. New destinations give them plethora of opportunities to introspect and research on many new topics to gain an insight about anything and everything ranging from that particular place’s culture, tradition, heritage, people and the place in its entirety.

It is on their paths of adventure and trekking that they often tend to unleash their heartiest interests of life. It is their passion for travelling that makes them discover their passion for diverse and vivid hobbies like photography, reading and writing.

Most of the travelers who have shared their experiences often opine that it is travelling that has enabled them to socially connect well with people. Even an introvert who undertakes travelling subsequently in life has metamorphized into an extrovert. He has had a remarkable transformation in his personality leading to making friends and building new contacts within a short span of time.

It is quite interesting to notice that avid travellers are the ones who are great at having conversations. With not only the ability in making friends within a couple of minutes, they can engage us in the best of conversations. Ranging from one's life to the world in its entirety, they can never get out of a topic to discuss about. It leaves the listener awe-struck and inspires them to unveil the pleasure of travelling.

Dealing with missed flights, wrong turns, delays, traffic jams, bad street foods and much more makes the travelers more adaptable in life. They are better at adapting and getting adjusted to a new environment within a short timeframe. Once they have travelled to many places and faced every hardship possible, they tend to brave all odds that come their way with ease in life. They are more flexible and can get accustomed to any change in plans thereof without having any frustrations. They have an unmatched confidence quotient and their confidence is derived only and only from their multiple experiences and encounters with new people on their journey trails.

Frequent travelers are not keen on the materialistic aspects of life. On return from travel, being a minimalist, they are content with whatever little they have or get. They take life on a much lighter note. They are comfortable at accepting mistakes and shouldering responsibilities as travel teaches them that it all works in the end and there is no need to stress or fret about anything. They strongly believe that leaving one's comfort zone is the best way to taste the values of life.

Travelling simply teaches one what happiness is all about. A happy person eventually becomes more relaxed, more confident and looks at the brighter side of life. The more they travel, the more they get better in looking at world and people in it, pushing their boundaries, venturing to new pastures and trying out new things thereby making them more open minded, outgoing and an awesome person.

It is up to us to take time out of our busy schedules and travel and explore the beauty of the world. After all, travel is the best education anyone could have. In the words of Robert Frost “The woods are lovely, dark and deep, But I have promises to keep, And miles to go before I sleep, And miles to go before I sleep.”
